

A: I'm so relieved to have finally landed a full-time job.

B: That's awesome! How was it when you were out of work?

A: Honestly, it was really stressful. I had to keep proving I was actively looking for jobs just to get unemployment (1).

B: That sounds tough. Did you do any temping (2)?

A: Yeah, I did some substitute teaching. It was a good experience, but there weren't enough classes, which made the wages (3) inconsistent. Some months were really tight.

B: I get it. So now you've got a stable full-time role. How's that going?

A: It's such a relief to be on a salary. I know exactly what's coming in, which makes planning my expenses so much easier. Plus, there's overtime pay if I work late.

B: That sounds way more secure. Are there any perks (4) with the job?

A: Definitely! They provide a generous professional development budget, they offer free lunches, and there's even a free gym onsite.

B: Nice. And how's the benefits package?

A: It's really solid—full health coverage, a pension plan, and paid time off.

B: Sounds like you've landed somewhere with everything you need.

A: Indeed. How about you? How are you getting by?

B: I'm actually on a government grant (5) for a research project I'm working on. It's been a great opportunity—flexible hours and funding to cover my expenses while I dive deep into the subject.

A: That sounds amazing! What's your research about?

B: I'm studying the impact of urban planning on mental health, focusing on how public spaces influence community well-being. It's challenging but really rewarding work.

A: That sounds fascinating!
