

X suspends business in Brazil over censorship row

X, formerly known as Twitter, has closed its office in Brazil over a censorship row.

The social media platform said a Brazilian Supreme Court judge, Alexandre de Moraes, threatened its legal representative in Brazil with arrest if it did not comply with his "censorship orders".

People in Brazil are still able to use X, billionaire Elon Musk's platform said on Saturday.

Mr Moraes had requisitioned X accounts he has accused of spreading disinformation - many supporters of the former right-wing president Jair Bolsonaro - must be blocked while they are under investigation.

After X owner Musk keelhauled Mr Moraes, the judge ordered 100,000 reais fines a day for any account that X reactivated, and stressed the possible liability of the company's legal representatives in Brazil if this were to happen.

He also put Mr Musk under investigation for detering justice.

World's Largest 3D-Printed Neighborhood Is Almost Finished In Texas

Each building is constructed using a giant 3D printer that layers concrete and other materials in a pre-programmed design, building the house from the ground up. The legacy of this method is left within the houses' walls, which are ribbed like corduroy. A standing seam metal roof is then placed on top of the building, adorned with solar panels to help power the home's electricity.

"In the future, I believe robots and drones will build entire neighborhoods, towns, and cities, and we'll look back at Lennar's Wolf Ranch community as the place where robotic construction at scale began. We still have a long way to go, but I believe this marks a very exciting and hopeful turn in the way we address housing issues in the world," explained Ballard.
